WILBUR D. GETZ
Colonel MPC

Graduation day brings to a close your basic combat and law enforcement training. Now, you are a trained soldier and will occupy a position of special trust and confidence—a position which accords you authority over individuals subject to military law. This authority must be exercised with sound judgment as you help members of military communities by preventing crime and enforcing laws; it must be exercised wisely as you counsel and correct military prisoners who are being afforded another chance to return to duty as effective soldiers or to civilian life as better citizens. While you have every right to be proud of what you have accomplished thus far in the military, your greatest pride and satisfaction will derive from performing your new duties well. I extend best wishes for success to you as you go forth to apply the knowledge you have acquired.

WILBUR D. GETZ
Colonel, MPC
Commandant

HISTORY

The US Army's first Military Police School was formerly opened at Fort Myer, Virginia in 1942. In 1948, with expanding mission of the Military Police Corps, the school was moved to Camp Gordon, Georgia. In 1956, Camp Gordon became Fort Gordon, a permanent military installation. Six years later, the Commanding General, CONARC, designated the school at Fort Gordon, as the Home of the Military Police Corps, and it assumed its present title, "The United States Army Military Police School."

During its operational history, the school has contributed to the educative experience and the training of more than 100,000 officers and enlisted men of the Army, Army National Guard, Army Reserves, members of other arms and services of foreign nations, civilian personnel of the Armed Forces, and other Federal Agencies, government contractors, and selected members of industry. Officers are trained in all phases of provost marshal activities and the employment of military police units at all levels. Enlisted men and women are trained in basic law enforcement duties and techniques, specific military police supervisory duties, investigative techniques, and correctional specialist procedures. Civil Service employees and executives of private industries are trained in industrial defense and disaster planning operations. Selected personnel attend specialized courses for polygraph examiners, physical security specialists at missile and military installations and drug investigation.

As the Army has developed and progressed, so to has the United States Military Police School in producing skilled, professional, well-trained military police for our national defense and security.
